Constant cultivation during summer with the hoe is a great help to them, and most sensibly felt if performed while the dew is on.

This holds good with all the Brassica or cabbage tribe, so much so that a fine growth has been known to result from it without manure from the ground that wo'd otherwise produce nothing, if cropged with these rank feeders.

> "The more we hoe, The more we grow,'

Is an old garden distich that should never be lost sight of by those who would excel in the growth of kitchen garden produce. Many fail to obtain cauliflower from their not heading it before frosts; when this is the case, it might be advantageous to state that if they are lifted, roots and all, and placed in the root cellar, the flower will come during the early part of winter, and thus produces a cuisine dainty that an epicure might be proud of.

The cauliflower may be said to be a superior sort of brocoli, being well grown of snowy whiteness, and as tender as asparagus when properly cooked. Edgar Sanders.
